

Working prisoners in the USA

Laws, policies, and practical realities

Ben Jarman
Birkbeck, University of London
b.jarman@bbk.ac.uk

Helen Fair
Birkbeck, University of London
h.fair@bbk.ac.uk

2024-09-11

Abstract This briefing examines the law, policy, and practice of prison work in the United States, focusing on Arizona, California, and Texas. It provides a comprehensive analysis of work and employment training opportunities for prisoners in these states, contextualised within recent trends in their prison populations and in the legal framework governing prison labour. The briefing explores how different levels of custodial security affect access to work opportunities and examines relevant case law and state-specific approaches. Recent policy developments are linked to penal cultures and prison population trends. The briefing suggests that prison work in these states primarily subsidises state institutions rather than enabling exploitation for private profit, with most work involving prison maintenance or producing goods for public sector use. Despite low labour costs, many prison industries struggle for economic viability. The analysis highlights a lack of reliable, comprehensive data on prison work, hindering thorough analysis and informed policymaking. Areas requiring further research include the specifics of ‘prison housework’, long-term outcomes of prison work, and implications of penal policy shifts. The briefing aims to contribute to evidence-based policy reforms that can improve outcomes for prisoners while addressing broader societal concerns about justice and rehabilitation.

Contents

Availability 1

Availability

Available at <https://eprints.bbk.ac.uk/id/eprint/53813>.